JACK POPEJOY: Regional planners say up to $216 billion is needed for Southern California freeways, mass transit and other transportation the next 25 years just to cope with all the added traffic.

Southern California Association of Governments has issued a report that looks at the daunting task of handling the six-million more people and three-million new jobs expected by 2030.

The [unintelligible] of the proposal is the planners urge raising gasoline taxes ten cents per gallon by the year 2015.
